Yasuo Hayashi was born in Kyoto the son of a potter. In his early life he was interested in painting more than pottery and studied Japanese painting at Kyoto Municipal Art School together with Hisao Domoto (1928-2013) and Matazo Kayama (1927-2004), both of whom went on to become renowned painters. As Japan entered World War II, he joined the Imperial Japanese Navy Air Service and eventually applied for Tokkotai, a special unit for suicide strikes. In 1945 whilst awaiting orders for his suicidal mission in Oita, the war ended and he returned to Kyoto to resume his painting studies.

However, his pilot training during the war and the experience of spatial disorientation whilst flying in vast open spaces made it hard for Hayashi to return to two-dimensional painting and he returned home to study pottery at the family kiln. His father encouraged him to innovate and not to imitate traditional wares produced by the family, giving Hayashi the freedom to produce whatever he felt.

This freedom led Hayashi to found a study group of avant-garde ceramicists in 1947 known as Shikokai with Sango Uno (1902-1988), Yasunori Suzuki (dates unknown), and Uichi Shimizu (1926-2004). Here along with other young potters he pursued new, sculptural ceramic making rather than conventional pottery vessels.

From 1962 to 1977 Hayashi joined Sodeisha (Crawling Through Mud Association), an influential avant-garde ceramic art group founded by Kazuo Yagi (1918-1979), Osamu Suzuki (1926-2001) and Hikaru Yamada (1923-2001) amongst others, and he continued producing and exhibiting unique works created with his fine technique and well-honed senses. From 1972 to 1998 he taught ceramic making at the Osaka University of Arts and was designated as a professor emeritus for his great contribution.
